The interactions between dynamical systems theory and biology have had lasting impact upon both, but they are not symmetric. As biology becomes increasingly quantitative, the interactions are likely to increase. This lecture will review my experiences as a mathematician working at the interface with biology, emphasizing the role of multiple time scales in biological models. It will also discuss why the solution of outstanding mathematical questions is essential to progress within biology.