

Probabilistic techniques in mathematical phylogenetics: relating combinatorial and variational distances on trees

Sebastian Roch
University of Wisconsin

Cornell Probability Seminar
February 25, 2013

Abstract

I will describe recent results on a deep connection between a well-studied phase transition in Markov random fields on trees and two important problems in evolutionary biology: the inference of ancestral molecular sequences and the estimation of large phylogenies using maximum likelihood. No biology background will be assumed. (Joint work with A. Sly.)